The work-from-home setup among many employees has become a standard in this new normal setting brought about by the pandemic. This resulted in multiple changes in one's lifestyle and even in one's monthly expenses. Most people have reported that they have significantly reduced their expenses for transportation, but in return, their electric and Internet bills have skyrocketed due to their prolonged stays at home. The scorching summer heat does not help in reducing the electric consumption at home with most families using their electric fans and even air-conditioning units almost nonstop whenever they are at home.

In times like these, when we all heavily rely on technology for school, work, and personal relationships, having our gadgets slow down especially when we need them the most can be incredibly frustrating. Deleting photos, apps, and other large files that you no longer need can free up space and significantly improve the speed and performance of your gadget. Also, constantly shutting down apps that are playing in the background can help reduce the processor's work and help speed things up as well. Lastly, you may also consider upgrading the gadget's storage capacity if it supports this kind of customization.

Paragraph C.

Constipation is the irregularity of one's bowel movement. People suffering from constipation often report experiencing feelings of heaviness and having difficulty in excreting their stool. Increasing your water intake and incorporating more fiber into your diet are general rules on how to prevent constipation. A quicker way on resolving this problem is to take laxatives in the form of oral capsules or even tea that can rapidly take effect and bring relief to a patient. However, not a lot of patients would want to rely on medications, that is why they would still opt to make changes in their diets and lifestyles.
